Course content

The Covid-19 crisis has once again failed to fulfil the hopes for a substantially improved cooperation between the states in the European Union, which is perceived positively by the citizens. Instead, especially at the beginning of the pandemic, the health policy disputes have added to the already existing mountain of crisis perceptions caused by the euro crisis, the refugee crisis, Euro-critical populism, Brexit and conflicts over the rule of law. At the same time, political promises are being made by the new leadership of the European institutions, for example in the field of environmental policy. In the area of the common security and defence policy, too, there are repeated calls for closer cooperation between the states in Europe in the face of upheavals in the transatlantic alliance on the one hand and a more potential appearance of Russia and China on the other. From the Swiss perspective, the question of the form of cooperation with the EU remains an ongoing issue.

Both the socio-political, economic and geopolitical challenges in Europe and the comprehensive embedding of national decision-making processes in European policy-making mean that basic knowledge of the way Europe is governed is very important. A robust knowledge of the political structure and dynamics of European governance is a central prerequisite both for a critical examination of current developments and for the formation of one's own ideas about the development of a common future in Europe.

Examination content

There are two parts: a midterm exam (40%) and an endterm exam (60%)

The Midterm Examination focuses on knowledge-based elements relating to the structure and functioning of institutions and key elements of the internal market, economic and monetary union and cooperation between the EU and non-EU countries.

In addition to the knowledge-based component on other policy areas (e.g. area of freedom, security and justice, common foreign and security policy; democratic deficit), the Endterm Examination places particular emphasis on analytical skills. To this end, the second part of the course will present and apply important theoretical concepts.

Both the midterm exam and the endterm exam build on the mandatory readings and the learning groups.
